"SPARKS OF FLINT"

HOXIE FEATURE

SYNOPSIS

Jack Stokes, a young ranchman, was in love with Elizabeth Welsh who in turn loved him. They would have been married if it wasn't for the fact that Elizabeth tired of ranch life and went East to finish her education. She left behind, her little sister Phoebe and her aged father, an old miner who owned land rich in gold, which land he intended for his daughters.

Flint, a man about town, realizing the value of the land the Welsh girls would some day inherit, posed as a friend of the family, and hoped to marry one of the daughters for the purpose of securing the land.

He carefully laid plans to ensnare Phoebe into a marriage with him, but Jack rescued her in time to prevent such a thing, and gave Flint the beating of his life and a dip into the river to impress upon him more fully the fact that he must keep away from Phoebe.

Not being successful in his attempts to marry Phoebe, Flint goes East in search of Elizabeth. She has become indifferent toward Jack, and consents to marry Flint - not knowing, of course what a bad character he really is.

The news of this marriage almost broke Jack's heart, for he considered Elizabeth his sweetheart and wanted to marry her himself some day.

Phoebe too felt bad about the marriage and pitied poor Jack very much. She secretly admired Jack and he soon found that he was not entirely indifferent toward her.

In the meantime Flint returned and schemed with Hamby, a crooked attorney, and proceeded to take mineral title to the land. Jack, hearing about this, lost no time and went about matters in such a way as to beat Flint and Hamby at their own game.

After Flint had been convicted of fraud and jailed, Jack and Phoebe get married and the sisters become reconciled.
